

Anxiety is at epidemic levels, especially among our younger generations, who've been glued to technology and social media since they can remember. This combination of technology and anxiety is no coincidence.

Social media pulls us out of our present mind and localized body and sets our attention on global events and needs but rarely offers us any meaningful response.

We don't know how to discern between possibility and localized faithfulness, and we simply don't know where to mentally attend anymore, because we're everywhere at once, and we feel the pressure of being all there, knowing all the things, and doing it all perfectly.

With All My Heart
Christine Hoover

Only the Spirit of God can change a heart, so if we want our heart transformed to reflect the holiness and goodness of our King, we must cultivate holy secrecy, meeting with God and responding to what his Word reflects back to us.

With All My Heart
Christine Hoover

To approach the Bible as a mirror, puts our feelings and desires in submission to God. We bring ourselves to God, laying ourselves bare to Him through the disciplined reading and study of His Word. When we're systematic and thoughtful in our approach, we're allowing God access to speak when He wants to speak, convict when He wants to convict, encourage when He wants to encourage, and teach when He wants to teach.

With All My Heart
Christine Hoover

Without even thinking, words just came out of my mouth: "No weapon formed against me shall prosper, and every tongue that raises against me, God shall condemn it!"

The men staggered backward away from me. Something had pushed them—something invisible. I'm not joking. It might sound hard to believe, but the only explanation I have is some kind of angel had intervened on my behalf. Suddenly, the men were far enough back for me to get past them. My two attackers stood, bewildered and angry.

Run! I heard that still small voice cry. So I ran. Where do I go? Laundromat, I heard. I know what you're thinking. Crazy, right? But that's the point. Because a block later, I came upon an open laundromat. When I finally made it home, I called my aunt in Los Angeles. "Oh my God", I said, "this thing is real."

Taken For Granted
Gianno Caldwell

The kingdom of God is ultimately about allegiance. Jesus described it as being like a seed, invisible to the eye, implanted and sprouting in the hearts of those who have pledged their lives to Him.

And so, in order to understand and orient ourselves toward the kingdom of God, we must look at the heart. If our hearts are divided according to contradictory allegiances, we cannot and will not experience the joy and life Jesus promised us.

With All Your Heart
Christine Hoover

